

Controlled Chaos, Strategic Division, And Ultimate Power

Chaotically Charged Disorder, And The Power People

Keep them off balance, divert their attention, divide their spirit, execute your plan, and control the world.

By Faust Ruggiero, M.S.

Controlled chaos is a phrase often used to casually describe something that appears to be out of control, but which functions according to unseen rules or organizational principles. Sometimes, the organization results in a rethinking of the elements and activities in an unplanned chaotic enterprise. In other instances, the controlled chaos is purposeful, with a built in strategy and unseen rules designed to direct the enterprise toward a specific, but hidden objective.

Strategic division is the practice of maintaining control over one's subordinates or opponents by encouraging dissent between them, thereby preventing them from organizing and uniting in opposition. It can serve the interests of individuals and other organized entities who are in leadership and power positions as they attempt to implement programs which are personally profitable, but may either be unpopular, or have the potential for serious consequences.

Ultimate power, in its purest sense, is defined as having the ability and expertise to exert its influence over individuals, businesses, and political factions on a global scale. Regardless of how you define humanity, we still seem to live in a world which is based on power, and survival of the fittest. Throughout human history, the need for survival has always been closely tied to the quest for power. For some, especially in the industrialized nations, where survival often seems guaranteed, the progression beyond basic survival has paved the way for the potential for a rise to ultimate power.

When one considers the evolution of the human species, one of the most important attributes which have ensured continued survival in a world that can be harsh and unforgiving, is the adaptive ability of the brain to continue to expand on each and every concept, invention, and lifestyle change it is presented with. The human mind never stands still. As the world changes, it not only adapts to those changes, but it also actively attempts to control them. Sometimes, those adaptations are designed to insure survival, while other times, they expand to satisfy our desire for comfort. At other times, however, they are employed simply for profit.

Controlled Chaos

If you keep them off balance, you can control their thoughts, their feelings, and their actions. Control and chaos seem to be strange bedfellows. However, when the chaos is strategically designed and properly controlled, it operates according to a blueprint which is deliberate, and often very efficient. When a person or a group feels in control, that is, when they are more secure, properly informed, and united, it's difficult to divide them. Hidden agendas are hard to execute in this environment. Controlled chaos, however, provides the weaponry to divide unified people, making the success of hidden agendas more plausible.

Where there is stability, there is clarity of thought, and a positive and productive direction can be exercised by everyone involved in a particular movement. Stability, born of clear and concise thinking, typically rests on the premise that those involved are presented with honest and concise information, understand how a plan will be implemented, and have a clear understanding of the goals and destination of the program. It provides the impetus for a more in-depth review of any program's constituent elements.

When, however, when a person or group attempts to further agendas which may meet opposition by those whose agreement with or surrender to the agenda is necessary, other methods need to be employed. There is no more efficient way to interfere in the intellectual processing of the human brain than to introduce controlled chaos. Chaos with an agenda is always emotionally stimulated. It rarely has anything to do with the primary agenda. This preconceived chaos is usually something unrelated to the prime objective, is emotional, and always possessing the ability to divide any potentially dissenting individual, group, or organization.

For example, larger examples of power plays such as legislation that may have an impact on global warming might include information that would instigate resistance from conservation groups. They could provide the facts to the populous about the potentially threatening agenda. The introduction of chaos instigating information about a variety of other topics like racism, gun control, abortion, and other political agendas will divert people's attention. This can cause emotional interference that reduces their intellectual fact finding involvement related to the primary agenda, and while possible opponents are lost in the middle of the chaos, the primary agenda has the potential to become a more successful enterprises. Call it calculated deception by intentional diversion.

Strategic Diversion

If you divert their attention, you can control their minds. As chaotic targets, now emotionally charged, and often angry, buy into the alternate controlled chaotic environment, and diversionary measures have been introduced, it's important to control both the chaos, and the division which can result. So, bringing back the topics of racism, gun control and abortion, it's important to nurture the divisionary targets. This is done by continuing to provide emotionally charged attention to those items, without ever arriving at a solution. The matter is never settled. On a national level we see this done with the continued media coverage, and, from time to time, new legislation. The controversy though never seems to be settled.

This step is essential because it keeps the unsuspecting population focusing and debating issues unrelated to the primary goal, sometimes quite emotionally, while the issue being hidden is rarely, if ever, understood. If the targets of the controlled chaos understood the significance of the primary goal, they may voice opposition, and take action to ensure that the program does not see fruition. The diversion then, serves to reduce the possibility of any potentially dissenting factions from understanding the tenants of the primary objective, and interfering with the successful outcome of the primary program

So, the strategy is to keep people off balance, make them more emotional, keep them focusing on their anxiety, depression, and other mental health and ancillary issues, and keep them as weak as they possibly can be. We've heard discussions about the herd mentality that seems to be making its way across the world. Everyone wants to belong, but the direction to achieve this always seems to be unclear. The diversionary targets find themselves looking for leadership, but leadership is presenting an unending chaotic picture. In the end, the chaos targets become lost, following the crowd, but the air they breathe has been blown to them by the chaotic strategists.

Ultimate Power

Control their minds, and you can control the world. Evolution has a funny way of convincing us that we have moved away from our more primal style of life, and into the sophistications and intellectual complexities of human development. A closer look, however, tells us that this sophisticated intellectual vehicle for this forward movement seems to be riding on the same primitive emotional chassis it was built on. What began as survival of the fittest has simply evolved into the power of the fittest. Stones, knives, and other primitively fashioned implements of destruction have been replaced by misinformation, misdirection, trumped up social issues, and other divisionary tactics.

It has people believing that their rights are being taken from them. This will instill fear, and at times desperation. When this happens, the recipients of this controlled chaos become intent on intensifying their search for viable information. Unfortunately for them, they were never privy to the main agenda. Meanwhile, our divisionary chaos specialists are systematically removing those rights from an unsuspecting population, who firmly believe that they are, in some fashion, connected to this power base mirage. In a misguided attempt to ensure that their rights are not being violated, they actually bond closer with the chaos specialists, mistakenly believing that they possess the be honest information.

As this strategy comes full circle, not only is the primary agenda protected, and success all but at hand, the victims of this chaos driven diversionary plan, believe that they do, in fact, have the information, and they continue to fight for issues that will have no solution, and will keep them divided. These issues are important, and do require solutions. They, however, were not ever associated with the core goals, and will not receive the attention those objectives will receive.

Slavery was abolished in 1865. Almost 165 years later, though the battle has changed, racial issues are still here. Women's suffrage began in 1848. Have we arrived a point where women believe that this has been efficiently addressed? The Second Amendment has been part of the constitution since 1791. It's still one of the nation's most hotly contested arguments, with no apparent applicable solution. These are indeed important issues, and they do deserve attention, but this should never be part of a strategy to build and maintain power bases where power bases should not exist.

Our sophisticated human minds do not seem to have evolved to the point that we understand the advantages of unity, collective agendas, and human respect. Rather, still seemingly hell-bent to focus our attention on the smaller picture, we seem poised to continue to invest our energies in the divide and conquer paradigm. In the end, controlled chaos and strategic division will never produce its intended objective. Ultimate power will not survive the division it creates. Sooner or later, those unsuspecting chaos targets will have their say. Anxiety, fear, depression, anger, and the inevitable division they produce will give away to a power source all its own, and those targets will assert themselves. It's time we remember that we are all connected, and only through strategic unification will we ever see true power.
